The pilgrimage to Mecca is unquestionably one of the great phenomena in the history of Muslim peoples. It has largely been studied from the perspectives of medieval travel and learning, of modern administrative issues and of topics in the religious study of rituals.1 These studies provide a context for yet another approach, that of eliciting meaning in the pilgrimage, examining not only ...

Muslim Travellers - Taylor & Francis Group

The various essays assembled in Muslim Travelers, edited by Eickelman and Piscatori, both of them leading contemporary analysts of Islamic social life, develop this theme, exploring three principal forms of movement that gained explicit recognition and were to become of great religious and broadly social significance in later Islamic history: ha# (pilgrimage), rihla (travel for the acquisition of learning or some other appropriate wordly purpose such as commerce), and ziyara (visits to ...
