Urinary Cytology: Phase Contrast Microscopy and Analysis ...

The review of the literature of the period 1950-1982 shows that several authors have investigated the use of phase contrast microscopy in the evaluation of urinary sediment. All the authors have described the advantages of phase contrast microscopy over traditional bright field microscopy in identifying the particles of the urinary sediment, especially epithelial cells, casts, and erythrocyte morphology.

Phase contrast microscopy and clinical findings were correlated. RESULTS: The correct bleeding site was shown in 27 of 30 (90%) patients with glomerulopathy and in all 17 patients with bleeding from the lower urinary tract, indicating that this method of analysis has a sensitivity of 90% and specificity of 100% for detecting the glomerular source of bleeding.

Urinary Cytology: Phase Contrast Microscopy and Analysis ...

A urine sample is about to be examined under a phase-contrast microscope using a Neubauer counting chamber. The urine is under the cover slide, in the upper segment formed by the H-shaped grooves. The numbers and types of cells and/or material such as urinary casts can yield a great detail of information and may suggest a specific diagnosis.

Clinical urine tests - Wikipedia

To determine whether dipstick or microscopy results reliably predicted the presence or absence of a reportable urinary pathogen we performed dipstick testing and phase contrast microscopy on unspun urine from 500 specimens. We also investigated the relationship between the presence of squamous epithelial cells (SECs) and mixed growth on culture.

During each course, 17-22 urinary sediment components were shown by both bright-field and phase-contrast microscopy and, when indicated, by polarized light. Tests set before and after the course showed a significant improvement ($p < 0.01$) in the identification of erythrocyte subtypes, epithelial cells, fatty components, various types of casts and drug crystals.

How to improve the teaching of urine microscopy

A very good cellular differentiation and clearly visible nuclear details are absolute prerequisites in cytology for carcinoma and tumor cell diagnosis. Cytologists and pathologists rely on crystal-clear images of their samples with the highest color fidelity in brightfield, phase contrast, DIC, or fluorescence.
