Compelling evidence of emotions in elephants (and other animal species) was brought to our attention with the 1996 book When Elephants Weep: The Emotional Lives of Animals, which recounts numerous anecdotal accounts of animals displaying emotion and emotional empathy (Masson and McCarthy, 1996). Amongst the animals discussed there is a chimpanzee named Nim who appeared to show empathy in the form of compassion for people when they cried.

Do Animals Experience Emotions? - Psychologist World

Our team at the Maudsley have devised a series of animal metaphors (jelly fish, ostrich, kangaroo, rhinoceros, terrier) in a light-hearted manner to explain how these automatic reactions can be unhelpful. A veritable menagerie emerges as we metamorphose from one animal state to another in a desperate attempt to remedy the situation.

Model organism - Wikipedia

It was naturalist Charles Darwin who proposed that emotions evolved because they were adaptive and allowed humans and animals to survive and reproduce. Feelings of love and affection lead people to seek mates and reproduce. Feelings of fear compel people to either fight or flee the source of danger.

Overview of the 6 Major Theories of Emotion

Emotional responses are not static but change as a consequence of learning. Organisms adapt to emotional events and these adaptations influence the way we think, behave, and feel when we encounter similar situations in the future. Integrating recent work from rodent models and research on human psychopathology, this article lays out a model describing how affective events cause learning and can lead to anxiety and depression: affective events are linked to conditioned stimuli and contexts.
