Ultrasound is also very useful in the evaluation of the thorax and a variety of other 'small parts'. Ultrasonography is a valuable, non invasive imaging technique which can be used to assess the internal architecture of abdominal organs. In many cases this allows exploratory surgery to be avoided; in other cases, it can help to direct the surgeon towards a particular area of pathology.

A small device called an ultrasound probe is used, which gives off high-frequency sound waves. You can't hear these sound waves, but when they bounce off different parts of the body, they create "echoes" that are picked up by the probe and turned into a moving image. This image is displayed on a monitor while the scan is carried out.
