The ancient Greeks and Romans forbade iron in their temples and its use by their priests. Ancient Saxons would not put iron rune wands in cemeteries for fear that the iron would scare away the departed spirits. Iron has been a popular metal for making amulets with which to ward off danger, bad luck, and the evil eye. Iron amulets were worn by ancient Babylonian and Assyrian men in the belief that it would enhance their virility; the women rubbed themselves with iron powder in order to ...

The Norse Völva shamans used wands of iron, perhaps suggesting that magic was a resource to be controlled and manipulated through human means. As opposed to, for example, wands of Wiccan witches, which are made of wood, and suggest a connection to nature and its magic rather than power over it. It's also symbolic, if you think about it.
