The subsequent chapters by Piot, Smith, Freeman, Jones, and Parsitau are focused more specifically on a comparison between Pentecostal churches and NGOs as organisations. Two observations run across these chapters: on the one hand, we see how NGOs struggle to create legitimacy and sustained local participation, and how foreign dependency and their rational, disembodied outlook fail to capture people's imaginations.

Development was founded on the belief that religion was not important to development processes. The contributors call this assumption into question and explore the practical impacts of religion by looking at the developmental consequences of Pentecostal Christianity in Africa, and by contrasting Pentecostal and secular models of change.

Pentecostalism and Development | SpringerLink

Dena Freeman's primary goal in Pentecostalism and Development:

Churches, NGOs, and Social Change in Africa is to explore the role of five Progressive Pentecostal churches in Africa and to compare the development effectiveness of those churches to that of an international NGO in the same city.

A previous book, Pentecostalism and Development: Churches, NGOs and Social Change in Africa (Palgrave Macmillan, 2012), looks at the way in which Pentecostalism, one of the fastest growing religious forms in much of the global South, articulates with local development processes. It explores the ways in which Pentecostal belief and practice can lead to new values and forms of sociality, which in turn can lead to changes in economic behaviour.
